COMMENTS OF PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY (U 39 E) IN RESPONSE TO COMMENTS BY STATES OF WASHINGTON AND OREGON ON AB 32
REPORTING ISSUES

I. INTRODUCTION

Pursuant to the ruling of the Administrative Law Judges dated July 10, 2007, Pacific Gas and Electric Company (PG&E) provides its response to the comments filed by the Oregon Public Utility Commission (Oregon) and the Energy Policy Division of Washington State's Department of Community, Trade, and Economic Development (Washington) on reporting issues under AB 32. PG&E's comments address issues raised by Oregon and Washington on consistency, multi-state allocation, and gaming.

PG&E agrees that the comments by Washington and Oregon raise significant issues regarding the accuracy and consistency of emissions rates for current power imports as well as for the quantification of power imports used to calculate 1990 baseline emissions and the statewide emissions cap under AB 32. This complex issue has substantial cost implications for the state of California and possibly for the customers of all electric utilities within the state. The points made by Washington and Oregon regarding the method used by the California Energy Commission (CEC) and CPUC staff for estimating 1990 emissions from the Northwest raise the possibility that the CEC and CPUC method may set the 1990 baseline emissions and AB 32 statewide cap 20 million metric tons too low. Even assuming a relatively low estimated CO₂ allowance price of $10/metric ton, this artificially low statewide cap could cost California $200 million per year in excessive AB 32 compliance costs, or close to $2 billion over the 2012 to 2020 compliance period. Some of these overstated emissions reductions could be borne by electric utility customers through higher electric rates.

PG&E is also concerned, based on its preliminary review of the brief description offered by Oregon and Washington, that both the CEC-CPUC and Oregon/Washington approaches may artificially raise costs in the compliance period, by ignoring economic dispatch of deemed “residual” resources. In light of these issues, PG&E recommends that the proposed CEC-CPUC staff methodology for characterizing emissions attributable to power imports not be adopted, and that instead a marginal dispatch analysis be used consistently both for reporting of future emissions and for calculating 1990 baseline emissions under AB 32.

II. CONSISTENCY IN REPORTING PROTOCOLS

It is axiomatic that consistent application of a sound methodology for reporting and calculating GHG emissions is desirable. PG&E supports consistent use of a marginal dispatch analysis to assign emission rates to unspecified imports from both the Northwest and Southwest, for the 1990 baseline, current-year, and future compliance period emission rates. The CEC-CPUC staff methodologies would use inconsistent methodologies between baseline 1990 calculations and prospective calculations. Using inconsistent methodologies may result in artificially greater 1990 baseline year emissions, which set the target for the state as a whole. The result could be that, through apportionment of emissions reduction targets among sectors, some portion of the excessive emissions reductions targets may become the responsibility of the electric sector, artificially raising costs to California electricity customers through erroneous calculation of the 1990 baseline.

Oregon is rightfully concerned that the CEC-CPUC staff methodology, as applied to the Northwest, is not actually based on a marginal dispatch analysis. According to Oregon, California staff assumed “that [the Northwest’s] thermal resources, including merchant plants, first serve Northwest retail loads”, thereby leaving hydro to export. Oregon claims that “this does not reflect actual practice.” (Oregon comments, p. 1) Washington echoes Oregon’s concern, noting that California staff use “non-economic dispatch of Pacific Northwest resources for serving Pacific Northwest loads.” (Washington comments, p. 2)

PG&E shares these concerns. The CEC-CPUC staff used a marginal dispatch model for the Southwest for 2006, which PG&E believes is the correct approach. CEC-CPUC staff used other methods for the Southwest for the 1990 baseline, and for the Northwest for both 1990 and prospective reporting. PG&E believes these other methods are erroneous in significant respects. For these reasons, PG&E recommends the same type of marginal dispatch analysis be used for the Northwest for 2006, and for both the Northwest and Southwest for the 1990 baseline year.

III. ALLOCATION AMONG STATES

Oregon and Washington propose alternative methods for assigning emission rates to unspecified imports. Although details are sketchy, both methods are likely to assign an emission rate to unspecified imports that is probably higher than the result of a marginal dispatch analysis.

Oregon's comments cite an approach jointly developed with Washington: "Oregon and Washington's approach subtracts claimed resources, including most firm and some non-firm hydro, from the gross Northwest system mix to produce a net (or "residual") system mix." (Oregon comments, p. 1).

Oregon's comments make no mention of coal, which is a critical part of the emissions issue: Electricity from coal-fired power plants has a lower variable cost, but much higher CO₂ emissions, than electricity from gas-fired power plants. Unless Northwest utilities are required to claim their coal power, there is a risk that they will claim only the lower-emitting resources, leaving the coal power to be blended into the residual system mix that is applied to exports to California. Northwest utilities would thereby receive the economic benefits of coal power, but avoid responsibility for some of the associated emissions.

In contrast, PG&E expects that a marginal dispatch analysis applied to the Northwest would yield results similar to those California staff found for the Southwest. Using marginal dispatch analysis for current exports to California, Staff reported that the generation used for those exports comes primarily from natural gas-fired plants while baseload coal facilities mostly serve the native load of the states where they are located. (Joint CPUC-CEC Staff Proposal for a GHG Reporting Protocol, June 12, 2007, p. 9)

Washington's comments propose one model for consideration, which presumably is the same approach described by Oregon. According to Washington, "Each region could reserve for its own use all firm hydro, nuclear, and renewable energy generated in-region, except for any that is subject to unit-specific contracts. All unit-specific contracts (not system sales) would flow in accordance with the contracts. All remaining residual resources: non-firm hydro, coal, and natural gas, would be pooled each month, based on actual generation. All transactions to the south could be rated at the Pacific Northwest average of these resources in the month in which the transaction takes place.” (Washington comments, p. 1).

Washington’s description implies that residual resources, including coal, would be pooled (or averaged) regardless of their variable operating cost, ignoring economic dispatch. If adopted as described, Washington’s method is likely to allow Northwest utilities to receive the economic benefits of coal power, but avoid at least some responsibility for the associated emissions. This is equally erroneous.

Disputes over which regions and entities can claim non-carbon-based power, and which are allocated carbon-based power of various emissions intensities, are exacerbated by use of load-based rather than source-based points of regulation. These issues at dispute will cover both default emissions rates for power imports, which will be used to determine the magnitude of the CO₂ emissions, as well as decisions regarding the allocation of overall quantities of emissions among load-serving entities in each participating Western state. Under a load-based approach, the disputes inevitably would broaden if more Western states adopted load-based cap and trade structures, raising the specter of high stakes, multi-state controversies and litigation over administratively determined emissions rates and allocation of emissions quantities. These disputes and controversies should and can be avoided. Under a source-based or first-seller approach, such disputes will diminish over time as more states join and should disappear once all states in the Western Electricity Coordinating Council are part of a region-wide or national cap and trade compliance structure.

IV. GAMING

While contract shuffling may be endemic to any approach where default emissions rates are needed, Washington's proposal may be vulnerable to gaming which should be avoided. Washington proposes that emissions from unit-specific contracts "would flow in accordance with the contracts." (Washington comments, p. 2.) A gaming opportunity would arise if, for example, a utility outside California, subject to a load-based regulatory approach in its home state, were to sign a unit-specific contract to sell coal power to a marketer. The marketer could then submit a unit-specific bid from the coal plant into a market run by the California Independent System Operator. In this way, the marketer would receive the economic benefit of selling cheap coal power at a market price based on gas-fired power, and share that benefit with the out-of-state utility. The emission responsibility, however, would not travel with the economic benefit because the power was bid into the CAISO.

This concern is not academic. Under a load-based approach if used by Oregon, PacifiCorp's generation from the coal-fired Intermountain power plant is omitted from PacifiCorp's emission responsibility because that generation has been sold through a wholesale power contract, thus giving PacifiCorp the economic benefit of cheap coal but not the responsibility for associated emissions.

V. CONCLUSION

The comments by Washington and Oregon raise significant issues that must be discussed and resolved before GHG reporting protocols are adopted and before California's 1990 baseline emissions are established. Washington and Oregon's comments also reinforce the need for California to establish and update AB 32 standards in coordination and cooperation with other Western states, because power markets in the West are tightly interconnected and integrated, making the measurement and reporting of GHG emissions significantly dependent on regional power flows and transactions. In light of these issues, PG&E recommends that a marginal dispatch analysis be used consistently for emissions reporting and for calculating 1990 baseline emissions under AB 32.
